Q: Flask: static directory serving images doesn't work when run through cloudflare I have a website that is being served by cloudflare. I'm trying to serve an image using Flask (Python) on the same site, but I'm getting a 404. I believe this is because the static files aren't being served to the same place that the cloudflare site is serving. I have set the static file directory correctly in Flask. [EDIT: On further inspection, this appears to be because cloudflare doesn't load all requests to the same domain and thus, the requests are not being routed back to the flask server, and thus are being routed to the cloudflare server, which I believe is why I'm getting the 404. So, the question is, how do I get around this and have the cloudflare server load the files that it is serving to the flask server? I don't want to serve the static files through cloudflare as they won't get cached. Ideally, I'd like to keep the image on the cloudflare server, but for the sake of argument, let's say that's not possible. Is there a way to make cloudflare load requests back to the flask server? Or, is
