Although both the peel of Citrus spp. (e.g., oranges and lemons) have been reported to contain protective compounds against chemically induced hepatotoxicity, little is known about their ability to prevent chemically induced liver damage by their interaction with detoxification enzymes. This study investigates the effects of the hydroethanolic extracts from the peel of two Citrus spp. [Citrus myrtifolia (L.) Cogn. and C. sinensis (L.) Osbeck] on the rat liver cells exposed to tert-butyl hydroperoxide (t-BHP). The effect of Citrus peel extracts on the activity and expression of hepatic GST was assessed by using different assays. We also determined the cytotoxicity and
