The treatment of dengue hemorrhagic fever in children with plasma exchange: a comparison of three different volumes of exchange. Dengue hemorrhagic fever (DHF) is a serious, potentially fatal disease in children. The disease is characterized by a biphasic presentation, including severe plasma leakage, which is one of the most common and dangerous manifestations. Hemoconcentration can be attributed to the elevation of the capillary pressure. Various treatment modalities have been described for the control of this phase. The aim of this study was to analyze the effect of three different plasma exchange volumes on the course of patients treated at a referral center. In this retrospective study, all dengue children admitted between 2003 and 2012 to the Pediatric Hematology-Oncology Department of the Children's Hospital in Bucharest were included. The patients were divided into three groups according to the volume of plasma exchange treatment administered: 6.9 L, 7.1 L, and 8.1 L. The data were analyzed according to: the time of appearance of shock signs, type of the patient, severity of the disease, effectiveness of the treatment, and the duration of the treatment. Of the 39 included children, 23 were included in group 1, 11 in group 2, and 5 in group 3. The patients in the first group required the lowest volume of plasma exchange (6.9 L), with a mortality rate of 9.6%. In the other two groups, mortality rates were significantly higher, 43% in group 2 and 50% in group 3. There was a correlation between the volume of plasma exchange and the mortality rate. The mortality rate in the group that received the smallest volume of plasma exchange was not only higher, but also the treatment took longer. Patients treated with the highest volume of plasma exchange had a more stable hematocrit level and a better clinical outcome.
