Influence of a single dose of meloxicam on the pharmacokinetics of two drugs used in the treatment of cancer-related bone pain. The pharmacokinetics of the nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drug, meloxicam, were determined in 9 healthy male subjects, after a single oral dose of 15 mg. The influence of meloxicam on the plasma disposition of two analgesic drugs, buprenorphine and tramadol, was studied after the oral administration of tramadol (100 mg) alone and in combination with meloxicam (15 mg). After a 2-week washout period the same combination was again administered. Buprenorphine and tramadol were administered orally at 30 min and 1 h prior to the second administration of the combination. Plasma concentrations of both drugs and their metabolites were determined by a liquid chromatographic-tandem mass spectrometry method. Meloxicam did not significantly alter the pharmacokinetics of buprenorphine or tramadol. The combination of meloxicam and tramadol resulted in a lower maximum plasma concentration (C(max)) and a longer time to reach C(max) (t(max)) for buprenorphine compared with tramadol alone. Meloxicam did not significantly affect the C(max) and t(max) of either drug when administered in combination with tramadol.

Ferry Disaster
The Ferry Disaster (French: Le drame de la Déesse du Havre) is the name given to a major fire that occurred on the night of 19–20 June 1929 in the French city of Rouen, causing 61 deaths and more than 300 injured, with 2,700 left homeless and more than 500 buildings destroyed. It is the biggest maritime disaster in French history. Background The Rouen ferry service was made up of nine vessels (plus several smaller ones, which were now out of service). The service was scheduled to run from 11:00 to 6:00, but had only started operating a few days earlier. The service ran twice a day, from Rouen-Québec to Saint-Vaast-la-Hougue and from Dieppe to Le Havre. At the time of the fire, the service was made up of seven vessels: two river ferrys, the S.F. Le Havre and the Le Havre-Kérouilly; the ocean-going
