Changewave is an app that allows you to import, edit and export your contacts information using a spreadsheet-like interface. It is not quite like the normal contacts lists: when adding a new contact, it stores the contact information along with the email address; it does not use local database, but a simple spreadsheet that you can import from a CSV file. In order to export the data, you need to select the specific fields you want to export, and you can choose to transfer just the contact details, just the email address, just the phone number or just the birthday. A useful feature is the ability to add groups in order to organise contacts by categories, and it also allows you to search the list for specific data. From the settings panel, you can modify the list itself, configure how often the app checks for new contacts or the default save location. Performance and interface wise, Changewave proved to be very stable. No lags were noticed during the tests, nor were we able to identify any issues. For the sake of comparison, we used Word Lens which is a program that allows you to translate words you read into their correct English equivalents. Changewave also uses this feature, and it has a built-in list of 56 different languages. As far as language support is concerned, Changewave is definitely on a par with Word Lens. The overall functionality is very simple to use, so you will find it easy to get the hang of this app. A small flaw is that you cannot edit existing contacts information using this software, so you cannot update the birthdays or phone numbers. Another oddity is that the app has a really bad English support. Once you have finished your contact, you can export the information into a CSV format, which can then be imported into other applications. As for the technical aspects, performance was reasonable. On the one hand, during the tests, we noticed that the system did lag a little when we tried to add several contacts at once, so that it took a couple of seconds to complete the process. On the other hand, there is a built-in feature that allows you to change the default save location. This is a really useful feature, because it makes it possible for you to save the data on your computer instead of having to keep it on the memory card. From the settings panel, you can disable the automatic check for new contacts, specify where to store the data, modify the
