Does anyone have a way to do this? A: I would recommend using the MVVM approach of defining your ViewModel and not using the model directly. By using the ViewModel, you can have a cleaner separation between your model and the view. If you must use the model directly, the DynamicObjectAttribute won't work. Since it is a dynamic object (i.e. it has a type that is not known until run time), it doesn't have an IDictionary property or a SetProperty method. What you'll want to do is create a view model class that looks something like this: public class PiappViewModel : ViewModelBase { private readonly PostType _postType; public PiappViewModel(PostType postType) { _postType = postType; } public string[] Groups { get; set; } public string[] Tags { get; set; } public string[] Users { get; set; } } With this view model class, you can now construct the ViewModel without having to worry
