The invention relates to a filling-level indicator device for a container, in particular for a pressurized container for toxic chemicals, having a scanning device for scanning the container bottom, a transmitter for the continuous transmission of the scanning results and a display. Such a device is the subject matter of DE 199 23 039 A1. The container for toxic chemicals is preferably a pressurized container. Pressurized containers for toxic chemicals are routinely provided with a scanning device for scanning the container bottom. A typical container has, for example, a bottom with a base area, which is scanned by the scanning device. The base area can be scanned, for example, by optical scanning. In addition, such a device can have a transmitter that continuously transmits the scanning results, which are produced for example by optical scanning. The display is mounted on the device and displays the scan results that are available. The device described in DE 199 23 039 A1 has a transmitter for the continuous transmission of the scanning results, which is connected to the scanning device. A flexible cable is assigned to the transmitter and is guided to the outside of the device. If such a device is mounted on a wall of the container, for example for the visualization of the container bottom, the flexible cable is exposed to a good deal of wear, due to, for example, foreign particles, for example. It is the object of the present invention to develop the device of the above-described type such that the connection of the flexible cable to the transmitter is simplified, and such that the transmission of the scanning results is improved. This object is achieved according to the invention by the fact that the transmitter is mounted on a base body and the display is mounted on the
