Sensitivity to ergonomic stressors among serrated workers. To study the sensitivity to ergonomic stressors among serrated workers. This cross-sectional study was conducted in October 2009, in the University of Campinas (UNICAMP), São Paulo, Brazil. It included 762 workers of the university. Those who reported to have had any of the serrated occupations and who were present at the time of the survey in the atrium of the University in the data collection period were included in the study. The subjects were questioned about sociodemographic and occupational characteristics, health conditions, and the inclusion of musculoskeletal symptoms in the last 12 months, and their exposure to different ergonomic stressors. Associations were tested using χ^2 and analysis of variance (ANOVA). There was a prevalence of musculoskeletal complaints in the body areas (62.8%) with the dominant complaints being in the neck (29.0%) and lower back (27.6%). Positive associations were seen between sedentary work style and hand/wrist ($p=0.02$), neck/shoulder ($p=0.00$) and lower back ($p=0.00$) complaints. Negative associations were seen between higher body mass index and hand/wrist ($p=0.00$) and lower back ($p=0.00$) complaints. Positive associations were seen between low physical workloads and hand/wrist ($p=0.00$) and lower back ($p=0.00$) complaints. Positive associations were seen between high-volume work and neck/shoulder ($p=0.00$) and neck/wrist ($p=0.00$) complaints. There is evidence that workers in higher-risk serrated occupations are exposed to heavier loads and have a greater prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders. Grant's interest in the studies outlined in this proposal is his commitment to understand how thyroid function affects gene expression and protein function of the skeletal muscle, a tissue that is essential for whole body metabolism. The long-term objective of this proposal is to develop a better understanding of the role of thyroid hormone (TH) in mediating these processes in skeletal muscle as a basis for understanding the role of TH in whole body metabolism. Previous work from this laboratory has shown that both hypothyroidism and hyperthyroidism cause alterations in the gene and protein expression pattern in adult mouse skeletal muscle. The
