Citing, USA Today, a report said that people who purchase phones at discounted rates are caught in a "leash-snapping web of convoluted middlemen," who get in return "commissions and incentives to sell the phones to consumers". This makes the devices even more expensive for the end-users. The report, says, that in some cases, the "extortion" has turned to "gunpoint" and that it has happened in some states like Pennsylvania. The practice has got so common that in the case of "leash-snapping" websites, in which the mobile phone companies don't directly sell devices at discount rates, consumers can sometimes pay up to $200 just to secure a device. In some cases, consumers are also forced to pay a third party to handle the transaction. In a digital world, where it is easier to steal a device than it is to steal a physical object, such as a cellphone or a laptop, the problem is even more acute. As reported by USA Today, Sprint, AT&T and T-Mobile have been reported for adopting the practice. And, as per the report, the practice is an unregulated practice in several states. In the state of Pennsylvania,
