On Friday the Labor Department reported that the U.S. economy added 165,000 new jobs in July, and the unemployment rate fell to 7.7 percent, which represents its lowest level since January 2001. That's the kind of news that can spark some optimism about what's next for the U.S. economy. Unfortunately, our sense of optimism is also tempered by what we've seen over the past few years. The U.S. economy was on a fairly good path to a full recovery from the financial crisis. But it's now clear that the central banks across the globe took a turn for the worse when they started cutting interest rates. This is the opposite of what the U.S. economy needed, given how high unemployment was in the first quarter of this year. This decline in the job market has to stop There were also hopes of a stronger labor market after the winter weather wore off earlier this year. And the fact that the U.S. unemployment rate has fallen to its lowest level since 2001 — which many consider to be a level of full employment — is certainly good news for a lot of Americans. But it's also important to remember that the unemployment rate — which is only a statistical construct — doesn't tell the whole story. For example, many workers simply stop looking for a job. They might be willing to take a job paying a lot less than their current one — if it means that they have a job at all. So when the unemployment rate drops, that's not necessarily a sign of a strong job market. A better measure of the job market is the unemployment rate of people who want to work, but are either unable or unwilling to find a job. And this measure is still stuck at a very high level. In other words, there are still a lot of people out there who
