Tuesday, June 21, 2007 I really thought the gas crisis would never end. We're lucky to have the food and water to deal with it, but I think the average family is going to have to give up a lot. Of course, food and water can't last forever. We'll be going through it in the not-too-distant future, and the food shortage will go beyond just eating your way through cans of corn. Food riots are inevitable. I'm not sure if I'm more worried about actual violence or about the violence of language, and how it is turned against people. I saw a recent news story about people calling in to radio talk shows and saying "Those Jews are getting a free ride." This statement is now being made by real people, not just wingnuts and conspiracy theorists. If things go badly for the "free ride" Jews in Israel, people will start thinking that you can't be a Jew and be a human being. You can't protest when children die and you still eat pork and celebrate Halloween. You can't tell anyone to suck it. You can't say the right things about how some other races are inferior. The radical Right and radical Left are going to start to look more alike. If you are against immigration, and against the welfare state, and for a small government, and you vote Republican, then you are a radical, and we might as well call you a Communist. The South is going to start thinking that they were right. The Democrats are going to start thinking that they were right. If you are radical now, then you will be radicalized even further. You can't become another Glenn Beck. You can't yell about homosexuality and people will ignore it. You can't yell 2d92ce491b
