Use of glucose infusion during acute phase insulin treatment in acute leukemia. Seventeen consecutive adult patients with acute leukemia, including 7 patients with acute myelogenous leukemia (AML) and 10 patients with acute lymphoblastic leukemia (ALL), were treated with acute phase insulin (API) therapy (APIT) in combination with continuous glucose infusion (CGI). A two-dose protocol was employed, and patients received one course of daily APIT treatment in 3-week periods. The first course of APIT consisted of intravenous injection of 70 units of Novoamin (Novolin), glucose, and insulin. APIT was then continued using 50 units of Novolin, glucose, and insulin administered intravenously every 3-4 h. A reliable biological response to APIT was obtained in 10 patients. It was not possible to test all patients for biological response to APIT because the available HLA-matched control cells were not sufficient for all patients. However, the in vitro tumor cell growth of 3 patients was more rapidly inhibited after APIT than it was after chemotherapy alone. The in vivo tumor suppression was documented in 4 of 10 patients tested. While the growth of 1 patient with leukemia was sustained, the tumor mass progressively increased in 2 patients. A reduction in tumor size was observed in 1 patient with AML, but the decrease was not accompanied by a normalization of peripheral blood counts. One patient with ALL died. Adverse effects of APIT included severe hypoglycemia in 4 of 7 patients and a reversible change in mental status in 2 of 17 patients, both of which were temporary and not associated with tumor progression. Results of our study suggest that APIT can be successfully used in the treatment 3ef4e8ef8d
