etc) A: To pass from view to controller you should use the `Html.ActionLink` method. You would create an action to return a view that contains the textbox that you want to populate, which will eventually be rendered by the `HTML.ActionLink` method.

If you want the values to persist and you want to return a View instead of Html, you should use the `Html.BeginForm`. To check the current value in the textbox, you should use the `@Html.TextBoxFor` method. Can you imagine it? A 24-hour non-stop puddle jumper, towing a carton of eggs in a blistering-hot cargo hold? I can't, but then again, neither could the sailors who set the records for distance and time. They all did it in one way or another. The record for the fastest Atlantic crossing was set by a pilot who made an epic run from Nova Scotia to France in record time. The record for the longest voyage was set by another pilot who made a transatlantic crossing, but with passengers. And the record for longest flight? Well, that was easy, since it was just a piece of cake. All the records were set, and broken, by aircraft. They are airplanes, for Pete's sake! They all know that life is much better in a hot air balloon. Or maybe on the four-wheel-drive boat. But there's an upside to everything in the ocean, and they can't deny it. There are still puddle jumpers doing the kind of things that have made their pilots famous. The same pilots who used to do years of tours in the Air Force, or Navy, or Army, or Coast Guard. They are the old salts who did a three-month tour in the merchant marine, and in 30-year careers, they never had the chance to do anything else. So now they cruise in the tropical sun, mainly in the Mediterranean and Caribbean, with loads of room for passengers. And it's a lot more fun than on a tanker. So many times, I've been on a ship where I get to be on a tanker, but can't do anything else. A long-distance cargo flight is basically a giant piece of machinery. But if you get to be the pilot, the captain and the navigator, you get to do the
