, in a triangle or as a virtual player, in a Pong-like game. "We're currently interested in recreating the original Atari Pong," said Charan. "It's something that will be much more fun for the kids, and we are working on it." The team at Maize Creators is now getting ready to launch the first version of its app to the App Store. "We're just looking for a way to be able to get a little bit of funding to start working on this," said Charan. "We have about 10 different projects in the works, but this is the one we feel is the most important to the team and the most fun." These days, you don't have to be a six-year-old to create your own video game. The technology to create and play them is available to anyone with a tablet or smartphone. But there are challenges. First, a game is more than the simple product. A game requires a community. And that's a little harder to come by for a tablet-based game. "For the most part, you will find kids are looking for games that will entertain them," said Charan. "If you go into the App Store and look at the most downloaded games, you will notice it's mostly games that are for children. Games that require young children tend to be sports games. In that case, there is a huge demand for them. A lot of that is really because of the amount of money the players will be willing to spend." Some games try to avoid that by using games that are meant to be played by multiple users. A game like Cut the Rope, which requires you to stack a virtual candy bar on top of a candy cane in the process of solving a puzzle, is designed for a single user to play and not necessarily to be entertaining for a child. As for how to get the word out to a child audience, Charan has been very active on social media and has set up a website to show his new game. While he wants to get attention from parents, he also understands that parents themselves are worried about getting their kids involved in games that will endanger their attention. "In some cases, we know there is a very big difference between what a kid wants and what a parent is willing to allow. We try and play into that a little bit," said Char
