. . A: It's called cropping, that's what it's doing. The software that is doing this, is offering you to crop the image. Cropping removes black borders from the original image, and saves space on your device. If you have a picture that's larger than the screen, and you want to crop it, the only way to do this is to select the area you want to keep, and then crop. Usually, for things like this, you can get a program that does the cropping for you, or a program that makes it easy to do this in a photo editor, or a combination of both. In any case, it is not bad, even though it takes up space.

Zinc supplementation in the elderly: recent developments and future prospects. Since the mid-1970s, when the zinc status of older people living in the community was first examined, there has been interest in identifying and maintaining the zinc status of older people. To avoid the variability in plasma and erythrocyte zinc levels that are related to seasonal variation in the diet, many studies have been based on the use of zinc supplements. However, the doses used in the majority of the published trials have not reflected the nutritional status of older people in the United Kingdom and the changes in diet and lifestyle that may occur as people age. Recent studies of zinc supplementation in the community have examined the use of zinc as part of the general community practice rather than as a study group of older people with well-documented zinc deficiency. The results of these studies have shown that the ability of the elderly to absorb zinc from a typical dose of 20 mg daily is very poor and that the results of studies in which zinc supplements have been used may not be directly relevant to the health and well-being of older people in the community. Further research to examine the consequences of zinc supplementation in the older population is necessary. Current evidence suggests that doses of zinc supplementation of 10 mg daily will not prevent the development of age-related functional decline and that doses of 40 mg daily may be associated with increased mortality in people with mild cognitive impairment.

Q: Using two itemize's in same equation I am trying to make an equation that lists out a series of equations. So far I have this:
$$\tau_m = \tau_e + \dots$$
