High Dynamic Range, stunning photos that really pop out HDR is about bringing a "high dynamic range" to your images, making them look more vivid and less dull. Aurora HDR makes it possible to open and edit high-dynamic range (.xr) images, with or without a camera support. Free version comes with a limited number of presets, more than enough to get started. The free version of Aurora HDR does not come with any presets, and the editing features are limited. We suggest you buy Aurora HDR Pro. Software reviews Pro: Simple and efficient. Complex and very powerful. I've yet to find anything comparable to the HP SE530 Mark II. It's gotten me through many new jobs, and plenty of photo work in general. I did find it slightly overpriced, and it did take some time to get used to its shortcuts, so it wasn't a bad thing to spend time getting up to speed. And the resolution and noise-reduction techniques are very impressive. I'd say it's a bit better than I was hoping for, but in a good way. I had no problems learning it either, there was enough I could see exactly what was going on (though I didn't take more than a few weeks to find my way around). I had the HP6x45II, and I think I can say that it's better in just about every way, but the SE530 is faster, and a bit more efficient. It's not a bad camera, but it's very good indeed. I'd give the HP SE530 II "Pro" - buy this one if you want a great, multi-purpose camera. Pro: Ease-of-use, great results. I bought this after looking at the review here, and was very happy with it. Color quality is very good, noise control is excellent, the colors are vibrant and accurate, and the interface is very easy to use and understand. Being of the Fujifilm X-series, there are some of the controls that are similar to the canon options, but for the most part, it is easy to understand and learn. I would give this an "A" - buy this one if you want a great, multi-purpose camera. Pro: Multifunction. I own both a Nikon D4 and a Fujifilm X-E3, and I really like the look and feel of both. What's New in the Aurora HDR?

High dynamic range (HDR) photography uses multiple photographs to capture the same scene. The software tools that are available today are based on the idea of two exposures (typically low light and high light) where the longer exposure records the scene detail but throws out the highlights that are too bright. In a new powerful version of Aurora HDR, we combine 4 exposures, making it possible to create high dynamic range pictures that combine very accurate high contrast detail with a very accurate image of the lightest details. Scenes can be used as high dynamic range photographs (image 1 and 2), or as high dynamic range (HDR) images where information is combined to make a HDR image. 10.
