But today's meeting with the NRA, in which Donald Trump sided with the gun lobby rather than with his own party, was a sharp reminder that it is not politics, but power, that matters most to the president of the United States. And the gun lobby is an important power base for the president. Trump's disregard for the politics of the gun issue was on full display at his meeting with the NRA at the White House today. At the meeting, where he agreed to push for a ban on assault weapons and raise the minimum age for those who buy semi-automatic rifles from 18 to 21, he also agreed to the NRA's demand that states be allowed to ignore the strictures of the gun-control law that President Obama passed in the wake of the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting in December 2012. The president repeatedly stood by the NRA as it sought to defend the rights of gun owners and appealed to Republicans to support the law because it would prevent criminals and the mentally ill from getting guns. Like George W Bush, who pursued the same course after the horror of 9/11, Trump has seized on the powerful gun lobby in America to deflect from the unpopularity of his domestic agenda. The NRA is one of the most powerful lobbies in the US and it has been joined by groups representing the oil, pharmaceutical and mining industries in a powerful phalanx of special interests, which has made it impossible for any president to enact a real reform of the American political system. No serious-minded conservative wants to surrender to the NRA on this issue. While its members may respect the armed police and the military, they also know the damage gun laws can do to American communities, and they know that the only way to get a gun is to buy it in a store. That is the reason they have been so aggressive in lobbying for a relaxation of gun laws and in 2016, when they met Trump, they urged him to support the GOP platform, which called for making it harder to get a gun. But Trump has been swayed by the NRA's constant lobbying and has made
