There is the desktop version (free), and also Windows/Linux/Unix (via the command line) .17:16 A solution is expected to be found to the “Brexit” crisis that will allow the UK to maintain a frictionless trade and customs relationship with the EU after the country leaves the bloc in two years time. Theresa May wants to make a deal with the bloc that would allow the UK to keep “maintaining full access to European markets”, according to a business newspaper. The Financial Times says that an interim phase that would allow the UK to “fly under EU laws, but not vice versa” is being contemplated. “We believe in a solution that allows us to leave the EU with a deal and to maintain full access to the market,” a government source told the FT. “The discussions are being held at an incredibly high level and no decision has yet been taken.” The government has been holding meetings for weeks at the Business Council, a mostly pro-EU body, to discuss this course of action. But, as yet, no solution has been found and the UK remains as near to chaotic as when the issue first emerged. The Financial Times says the cabinet is split between business bodies such as the CBI and banks who want to keep the UK open to the single market while pro-EU members such as the Institute for Government argue that it is unreasonable to expect the EU to allow the UK to have a completely frictionless trade relationship. The paper says the Observer reported
