Spread the love 145 Shares Bitcoin is known as a store of value and a payment network. Since its inception, it has been considered as a store of value. But, is Bitcoin's value really tied to the underlying commodity of gold? The answer to this question is yes. In this article, we will explain the correlation between Bitcoin's price and the price of gold. We will also talk about the impact the crisis in Venezuela has on the price of Bitcoin. The Correlation between Bitcoin's price and gold Bitcoin is an internationally accepted and secure asset, along with gold. In fact, it is derived from the design of blockchain and the cryptocurrencies. They are similar in many ways. Both have a time-based algorithm that ensures the creation of a new digital currency. Both of them have a fixed supply. They are uncorrelated to economic and political impacts. They have a high resistance to hacks and network attacks. Bitcoin has a block time of 10 minutes. So, a whole block is produced every 10 minutes. This ensures that the network is not congested. The block time is the same as the block reward that is introduced to the system. The block rewards are an incentive given to miners, which is used to encourage them to continue offering the solution to the block creation. Based on the difficulty of the proof of work, it is determined the block reward. In the case of Bitcoin, the block reward is 12.5 BTC. It will be halved every four years. If the reward is cut, it will reduce the rate at which the block is created. This means that with fewer incentives, the miners would not be able to find the solution to the block. This is considered as a threat, but the possibility of an economic crisis is higher. Governments are facing economic crises. A weakened US economy is one of the main reasons for this. The crisis in Venezuela Many of the oil-rich countries depend on this commodity. The crisis in Venezuela is one of the main reasons for the fall in the price of oil. With a reduced production, the value of gold has decreased as well.
