I have just finished master's degree and I have read a lot of interesting articles on the web. I have a belief, that every real mathematician have at least a definition of some object. I think that a researcher should have, at least, such a definition. So, how can one explain that he/she is not a complete mathematician? For example, the infinite sums, which is actually  $\sum_{k=0}^{\infty} a_k$ , is complete or not? A: Mathematicians worry about this a lot, and it usually comes down to what one has done in the past and what one has planned to do in the future. There are two main schools of thought: You can be a mathematician with a fairly naive definition of what a mathematical object is, or You can be very sophisticated about what a mathematical object is, and what kind of evidence is sufficient for claiming that it does not yet exist. I describe the two schools of thought in order of importance. 1) You are not a mathematician. Mathematical objects are defined for example as things that look a bit like real-world objects, but are organised in a way that you can understand all by yourself by just thinking a bit. This is the assumption of naive realism, in which you do not need anything else to have a true understanding of what a mathematical object is. This is the school of thought that people believe in in the popular press, usually in
