Why did Apple get such a huge leg up on Samsung? Google's patent infringement suit was a turning point for Apple. A month ago, Google and Samsung were on a collision course. The two are at the center of a patent dispute over smartphones and tablets. Google is accusing Samsung of infringing on six of its own patents, and filed suit against the South Korean company in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California. Samsung fired back and filed its own suit accusing Google of patent infringement. And that suit is now the backdrop against which we should view Apple's countersuit. It, too, accuses Samsung of patent infringement. And Apple's case is made of gilt-edged steel. The company knows its weaknesses and the risks associated with playing a defense. But it's a fight it's prepared to wage. Apple's strategy In a nutshell, Apple is sticking to its guns. On the one hand, it's repeating the "copycat" argument that's been raised in several other suits that aren't progressing too well. Specifically, the company is fighting Samsung's copying of some iPad apps, which it says Samsung copied "before Apple invented multit
