Raster vs. Vector Raster refers to anything that's made up of small, individual dots of color. It is pixelated or microscopic. Vector is an alternative to raster that uses lines to create the image instead of dots of color. It's similar to the look of a drawing or etching. Vector is more flexible and can be altered more easily than raster.

What's New In?

The Washington Post is reporting that congressional investigations may be launched into the misconduct of the Department of Justice, CIA and FBI. In general, the Post says, "intelligence agencies spied on Americans, regularly lied to the courts and Congress about their actions, and abused their powers when they misused a secret court for some of the most contentious domestic surveillance programs in recent history." The lity goes on and on. The Post story notes that, "top Justice Department officials have undertaken a review of the nation's top spy agencies — and particularly, of the actions of the Justice Department — in the aftermath of the Bush administration's surveillance practices." And, "lawmakers are asking whether the government's often-secret programs were legal and had the proper oversight." There is a popular view that George W. Bush's presidency was built upon deceit, and is a major cause of the federal budget deficit. In fact, we have no evidence that the Bush administration has ever made a serious effort to make things right in the aftermath of the CIA's/FBI's/DOJ's/NSA's worst abuses. In contrast, we are in the midst of what seems to be the most thorough examination of the Guantanamo prison and its problems, in decades, led by Obama himself. It's true that these agencies' crimes are a bad reflection on the United States. But, when the agencies engaged in extraordinary breaches of faith, it is the political leadership that has failed to reach out to the general public and warn them about what has happened. The failure to be frank has led to a reaction that is totally out of proportion to the facts of the scandal. When he decided to come up with his own surveillance program, the Bush administration went to extraordinary lengths to secure the programs' legal footing, and also to go to Congress to get permission to do this. In this case, the administration's legal analysis suggested that the "dragnet" surveillance of phone records and e-mails, and the harassment of journalists as potential terrorists, was all entirely legal. The administration's arguments meant that the FISA courts, which are relatively open to public inspection, were not allowed to review this surveillance. And even once the administration realized that these practices needed a re-examination, they failed to use the review process to explain their legal approach and to review the process for mistakes. Bush and his aides presented their actions as responses to the attacks of 9/11. But this is partly just a coincidence, as Attorney
