The identification of new words, especially in a narrow subject, is of great difficulty. In this case, we are forced to use spaces to place language pairs. Therefore, our work can be twofold. Sometimes the system includes up to a hundred different tables, and they are very difficult to remember. Thus, you should not hope that you will be able to present the whole mass of information in a short time. If you cannot remember about ten to fifteen tables, or only a dozen values are stored in memory, then it is better to get by with one table. But if you can remember more than thirty values, we recommend breaking this work into ten or twenty parts, placed in one of the horizontal tables. In particular, the section "Non-red words" can be divided into two parts: "Punished words" and "Old words". Remember that you must remember the words used in them very well so as not to confuse them, thereby significantly complicating identification. This will end the work. For details on tables, see "Table 2.10.1". Tables 8.1 8.2 Old stuff from William Strahan's "Invention on the Principles Of Science", New York, 1967 and below. A sentence about what you are doing at the moment, and the subsequent description of the process that you are doing, must certainly be included in each of these tables (or all). Within each table there may be other procedures, they are described in more detail in the "Three Minute Remembrance" section. We must not forget about the specifics of this group of books. The average reader often finds it difficult to identify the book to which this sentence is dedicated. Try to make as much memorable, original as possible. If you notice that your tables may differ from those proposed above, then here you can resort to the help of two tables: "Requirements for the content of tables" and the section "Prison for ethical reasons". So before you get started, consider changing
