The effect of etomidate on buccal ossicles and mandible using the enamel-dentine junction as the anatomical landmark. To determine the feasibility of using the enamel-dentine junction (EDJ) as a point of reference for laryngeal assessment with rapid sequences. Three observers assessed the EDJ of mandibular and buccal soft tissues at two time points on a series of patients who received etomidate and propofol at three different rates of infusion (40, 80, and 120 mg/ml of etomidate over 1 minute). The observers recorded laryngeal movements before and after administration of the drugs. Agreement between observers was calculated using Fleiss kappa statistics. Statistical significance was set at a P value Q: Drupal Views, Expose nodes of a specific content type and exclude other contents I have a content
