Gait Analysis: Recent Advances and Future Directions. Gait analysis is a complex functional evaluation that has become more and more important for clinical practice. In recent years, the importance of this evaluation for the follow-up of lower limb disorders has increased. In fact, the analysis of gait can provide information about the influence of some factors (age, diagnosis, social and cultural environment, etc.) on walking and can be used as an indicator of potential health problems. Moreover, gait analysis can provide important information that can help to improve the function of a patient. This paper aims to highlight recent advances in gait analysis and the clinical implications that these techniques have in orthopedics. A structured literature search of PubMed, SciVerse Scopus, and Web of Science was performed. Only studies written in English were included. We found 46 studies that described a total of 83 different gait analyses. The most common approach was electromyography. Gait analysis is a method that is widely used in clinical practice and can help to evaluate changes that are observed over time. However, the current evidence on gait analysis is still limited and of poor quality. Future research that highlights better evidence, research design, and the methodological quality of studies is needed.Relationship of macular pigment to plasma levels of lutein and zeaxanthin in humans. To investigate the relationship of macular pigment optical density (MPOD) with lutein and zeaxanthin plasma levels. We measured MPOD and plasma lutein and zeaxanthin levels in 20 young healthy subjects. We found a significant negative relationship between MPOD and plasma levels of both xanthophyll
