An engine unit mounted to a vehicle includes an engine to generate power and a power unit to convert power generated by the engine into drive force. A starter motor serves as a drive source for starting the engine. The starter motor includes a housing to house a motor and a control device for starting the engine, a connecting rod for converting rotary motion of the motor into linear motion, and a connector. The connecting rod is connected to the motor shaft of the starter motor and a flywheel. When the engine is started, the motor is driven by electric power supplied from the control device to rotate the motor shaft. The rotational energy is transmitted to the flywheel through the connecting rod, and then to the starter unit. The starter unit causes the engine to start based on a rotational speed of the flywheel. The starter unit includes a case and an electric power supply unit for supplying electric power to the motor. In an example of the above power unit, a housing is configured so as to be joined to a case by a bolt (for example, see Patent Document 1). The housing includes
