Version: Version 0.2 Author: MattyNovak License: GNU General Public License (GPL) Size: 1.1 MB PurgeFox Feature list: Are you looking for a solution to optimize memory consumption in your web browser? If so, you are in the right place. Instead of using the CPU for parsing HTML, JS, CSS or images, etc. you can switch to using the GPU for this task, and thus save precious memory and processing power. In this article, we will show you how to optimize a Firefox web browser for memory consumption using GPyodeler. But first, let's define what memory consumption is: Memory consumption can be defined as "the amount of RAM needed to store the Web pages, its images, fonts, etc. or in other words, the amount of RAM needed to store the browser and its context (page elements such as buttons, images, windows, etc.)". Memory consumption is a crucial factor when developing mobile applications. Mobile devices (phones and tablets) are often restricted to 2 GB of RAM, and the operating systems are optimized for only this amount of memory. If your app is using more than 2 GB of RAM, it will be forced to shutdown or even frozen. Why optimizing memory consumption? Optimizing memory consumption increases the overall speed of your web application. This can be
