A recent study shows patients are losing money by picking a doctor who uses expensive testing and procedures. "Patients have a choice of doctors, and they also have a choice of tests and procedures. It's a combination of both factors that have a bearing on their cost of care. A patient may use a very high-cost practice with an inconvenient location," said the study's lead author, Chris Callen, an associate professor of public policy and international health at Harvard University. "But those very high-cost practices with inconvenient locations also tend to provide a good deal of technology and procedures. And when those high-cost, high-tech practices are convenient, they are also more likely to overuse these procedures and overutilize tests."Efficacy of focused-ion-beam nanofabrication in nanopatterning. The focused-ion-beam (FIB) writing of nanostructures is the standard technique to pattern thin-film samples in microelectronics. With an anisotropic gradient in the sputter etch, the FIB writing can simultaneously determine the sample thickness. In this study, we directly determine the effective beam scanning velocity of the FIB on an ultrathin silicon nitride layer, and show that sputter etching the silicon nitride layer with 3 nm/s results in a subnanometer precision of lateral length. Further theoretical modelling suggests that the anisotropic gradient of the sputter etch is partly caused by FIB interaction with the edge of the nano-grating.Clinical and laboratory evaluation of standard and novel antimicrobial regimens in osteomyelitis and prosthetic joint infection. In the present study we evaluated in vitro activity of antimicrobial regimens for acute osteomyelitis (OM) and prosthetic joint infections (PJI) and also compared standard and novel antimicrobial regimens against the causative organism. We evaluated the sensitivity of 40 strains of organisms isolated from human infections. The antimicrobial regimens used were ampicillin plus gentamicin, vancomycin, linezolid, rifampicin, tigecycline, or a novel triple combination
