What's New in the?

AD Info is an active directory reporting tool that offers you a large number of predefined queries you can request. Google is experimenting with a more visual system for photos. If you are on an iPad or iPhone, now you can look up the definition of a word right from the keyboard. This is not a new feature from Apple, but this time Google has made it official, they are now working on a completely visual version of the dictionary. The icon for the feature is a rainbow colored word bubble. As you type, it will drop into place. This latest news comes as no surprise, since Google has already offered such a feature in their search engine. The feature is currently only available for Android devices and not for Apple. Google has a variety of image search tools, but this one is unique. Other tools usually have you searching for the answer via the search bar. This one looks like it is going to be a visual way to find that information. It also uses the tabular format which many services on the Google app actually use. The only thing that has us thinking that Google may implement this into their apps is their Maps app. You can go into the settings of Google Maps and enable the visual image search from the drop down menu. One of our editors brought up an idea we are interested to see. He said that some of the definitions that we are used to seeing pop up in the bubbles could be added as icons. One example would be "minor leaguer" which would look like a baseball. Another would be a "silent room" which would look like a see through cork board. This new feature shows us that Google is really pushing into the visual world. A lot of research is being done on this kind of technology and it will be interesting to see what they come up with next.
