Category:Computer-aided design softwareQ: JS Closures - Scope? How? The following code works, and indeed prints out "Hello World, 1" var a = {}; a.one = function() { return 1; } a.two = function() { var e = a.one(); return e + 1; } a.two(); I'm trying to understand the behavior and I don't quite understand how a.two() is able to access a.one() since it was declared outside of a.two(). If a.two() had the lines: var e = a.one(); return e + 1; The line e + 1 wouldn't be able to access a.one() If a.two() had the lines: var e = a.one(); return e + 1; a.two() wouldn't be able to access a.one() What is the underlying behavior of the closure here, and why can't it access a.one()? A: a.two() calls a.one() and returns 1 (because one is a property of a.) The return value of a.two() is then passed to a.two() as e and the expression e + 1 becomes e + 1 + 1. Two is then returned to the caller. This returns 2 to the caller. Nigeria's Nigerian premier League will take a new direction as they look to give fans an even better football experience. The decision to move the league's first ever fans' award, the G-Prize, off show stage to be held on February 7 at an off-site venue, has earned the ire of many on social media. While the award is a perfect and thought-out way to encourage fans to be as involved in the league as possible, many have seen it as just another gimmick intended to give fans the illusion of being involved with something rather than what it actually is – a simple affair. Here's a look at the reaction to the development. When you #GPrize guys no one will see it, when you give it away in a military facility do you see it, when you give it away in a mall in a tent in a parking lot do you see it It's a simple 82138339de
