We studied the effect of serum from patients with active rheumatoid arthritis on chondrocyte proliferation and on the biosynthesis of glycosaminoglycans and hyaluronic acid by chondrocytes. Serum from rheumatoid patients consistently stimulated the proliferation of chondrocytes obtained from the growth plate and from the articular cartilage. The growth rate of cells obtained from the epiphysis and from the diaphysis of the femur were not affected by serum from rheumatoid patients. Incorporation of 3H-glucosamine into glycosaminoglycans of chondrocytes was also enhanced by the addition of serum from rheumatoid patients. Therefore, these data provide evidence that serum from rheumatoid patients has direct proliferative and biochemical effects on growth plate chondrocytes. the relative distribution of the two nuclear fractions in the nine cytosol/nucleus fractions. The nuclear fractionations were then performed using identical parameters and conditions. The column eluates were electrophoresed on an agarose gel and the bands corresponding to the histones and the nucleophosmin were scanned using an Epson scanner. Histone/nucleophosmin peak fractionations were performed using the same protocol as above, with only the following changes. The gradient used was: a) 20 mM Tris-HCl, pH 7.5; b) 30% of buffer B, c) 40% of buffer B, d) 50% of buffer B and e) buffer B.
