The digital strategy, which was published last May, has set out our aspirations for a future where digital technology will be central to patient care. It aims to bring new capabilities within the National Health Service to be able to provide much more information through digital services that can be accessed at home, online, and in the community. And, with this being a new approach to service delivery, it has a big impact on the future of the NHS, and all its partners and suppliers too. We all have a strong interest in the success of the ambitious digital programme and the NHS national digital programme is specifically designed to build on our NHS networks and the digital infrastructure that will underpin the NHS for many years to come. We have a lot of work to do in order to bring all of the technologies and platforms that the programme is building on to service delivery, to enable patients and staff to access and use them. We've made good progress to date, and in the last six months the number of digital services to help patients to stay in touch with their GP has increased by 55 per cent,

It's not in the news much, but it's very significant, as is a growing backlash against the relentless pressure to take out loans that is built into the current financial system. The government backs usury, and fights against anti-usury laws and restrictions. This is part of the banking elite's game.
