There are two components to the action potential in skeletal muscle: the surface membrane of the cell and the voltage-gated Ca(2+) channels. The membrane component is the result of a sequence of action potentials produced by the nerve impulse and is responsible for the contraction of the muscle. Calcium channels, which are located in the surface membrane of the muscle cell, are responsible for the influx of Ca(2+) ions during the rising phase of the action potential. Different types of calcium channel have been identified in skeletal muscle and have been shown to be modulated by hormonal and neurotransmitter factors. It is probable that these calcium channels, in addition to their role in membrane excitability, have a direct role in the action of the hormones and neurotransmitters. It is possible that the cardiac hormone adrenaline can modulate calcium channels directly.
