| COPYRIGHTING YOUR PORTFOLIO Make sure you have the rights to the images in your portfolio. The easiest way to do this is to get your own copyright. | --- | --- | --- New versions of Photoshop are released with yearly release cycles, and no matter how many updates you've already installed, it's always good practice to check for updates. The Adobe website provides a handy link to download the latest version. A hard drive or a portable disk drive is the best way to store your work, but remember to back it up — often. When you start doing photography, you need to stick to one of three lighting situations: * Strong natural daylight * Low-light natural or studio * Unmodified flash The last one will not happen very often, but once it does, you'll want to master it. The first two will be the norm. You'll use daylight and flash most of the time because they're available any time of day. However, knowing what to do in these situations will be very useful as you're out and about shooting. | --- | --- ## Photographing in the Day Daylight is the easiest and most obvious light source to photograph with, but it can be limiting. No matter what kind of camera you have, it gives you one main lighting pattern: head and shoulders shots. It's easy to hide in shadows, and you don't have to think about how your image will look with the contrast between light and dark. You can get away with soft lighting when you're photographing people, because many of us look pretty good after the flash has gone off. | --- | --- ## Working With Low-Light Light Bringing darkness to light is the art of using flash, and it comes with some special rules for your image. Remember that flash is very unnatural and, unless you have your eyes covered, it will always look off-kilter. It's better to use natural light and light modifiers.

One of the most important aspects of the rendering process is how well the attorney is able to detect and negotiate deficiencies in any of the materials submitted. Traditionally, materials were produced in any number of formats that had to be adapted to the corresponding format requirements of a particular jurisdiction. Although the import of the related technology to today's market continues to grow, a majority of projects are still coordinated and handled using "legacy" systems. Unlike today, many legal principles were made to work in previously unique manners based on the "best practices" that had been defined. Most often, we encounter materials that are raw documents not reviewed by the required diligence and coordination while also being produced in non-legally sanctioned means. The end result is often a wildly inconsistent product which in turn can cause untold problems, from various deficiencies, to improperly accredited materials, and more. The following are some of the most common areas of conflict and the specific resolutions to each, which will allow for a smoother exchange of information and proper coordination with clients and the court: Paper Format: the common format for production is the custom-made "CASE" package, which is typically very cumbersome and difficult to manage, and not fit for a digital communication platform. In most cases, the "CASE" files are available electronically, but the surrounding information such as the filing instructions, fee structures, etc. should be supplied in the standard format as well, or the court-specific format. Electronic Filing: In some cases, the "CASE" document is not even available in an electronic filing format. This is often the case for email as opposed to a custom-managed system with file management infrastructure. Electronic Filing and Electronic Filing Responses: In addition to the standard electronic filing requirements, filings are typically managed with a software platform that has the capability to track all responses for a particular case. The electronically filed case file should be similar to the court-direct-filing process for speed and
