What can possibly be better than overhauling the EA Sports FIFA franchise? How about . EA Sports has made some great strides when it comes to its athletes. Alex Hunter, for example, is more compelling than ever. Thierry Henry is no longer a fan of monopolizing the number-9 role. Liev Schreiber is much more like a midfielder. And as for Clarence Seedorf, well, let's just say that he's no Messi. To make a success of 2012, EA Sports has to make sure the 2011 crop of athletes lives up to their potential. Given the fact that the league's top-selling football game is still FIFA, EA Sports knows that much of its star power lies in its players—not in its star GMs. Fortunately, EA Sports' efforts to create compelling players on the pitch are already paying off. Boniek Garczynski and Julian Denton played pivotal roles in EA Sports' Soccer Champ, developed for EA Canada. Garczynski helped generate the flair and athleticism that makes the game so appealing. Denton, meanwhile, used his expertise to create interesting and fun passing options. Based on a promising new soccer game engine, EA Sports' PES-inspired Soccer Champ is a perfect blend of quick-twitch gameplay and simulation. At EA Sports' Boston studio, the game is undergoing constant refinement as it heads towards release in June 2012. Also: Julian Denton Interview. Jun 8, 2012 The goal is clear.
