Keymacro is a lightweight and portable keyboard remapper tool. All the keys can be remapped to be used for another language. User can edit the mapping in the main interface, and this also can be run on Windows 8, Windows Vista and Windows XP. Keymacro will directly remap the keys that you press. You will be asked to press the keys you want to remap, then all the keys you selected will be remapped to use these keys instead. The tool is very easy to use, and you can test the remapping function in the Main Window. For example, you may want to remap the ctrl key to the right alt key so that you can type in other language easily. Or you may want to remap the alt key to the Win-F-1 key, so that you can get the Windows logo menu very easily. You can use Keymacro to remap any of the following keys: Ctrl, Alt, Win-F-1, Win-F-2, Win-F-3, Win-F-4, Win-F-5, Win-F-6, Win-F-7, Win-F-8, Win-F-9, Win-F-0, etc. Keymacro uses the xlkeypre.ini file to register keys. This file is stored in the Keymacro installation folder. You can find more information on the supported languages in the FAQ file. Keymacro works on Windows 2000/2003/XP/Vista/Win7/8/10. Note: Because there is no original xlkeypre.ini file, you may get the "You must reboot to apply all the changes." error message when you launch the first time. Keymacro also has an option to store the key mapping in a registry entry. You can choose the type of mapping you want to store. Once you have selected a value for the register key, the tool will automatically store the mapping in the registry. Keymacro is a portable tool, and it can be run on Windows 2000/2003/XP/Vista/Win7/8/10 as an exe file. It does not need to be installed. Keymacro can be used as a portable tool.

It does not need to be installed in the computer. Keymacro can run on any computer that is available to the network. For example, you can use a remote desktop to connect to 1d6a3396d6

I selected the Indiana University Libraries' e-ET (evapotranspiration) system and the Duke University Libraries' e-ET (evapotranspiration) system. A "reference system" is needed to establish a baseline; I selected one for each organization. I assumed that both groups of ET systems were running accurately, so I took the ET estimate from each system at 10:15 am each day for the four-day period from January 2 to January 5, 2013, and compared the two. The results of that comparison are shown below: Reference System Alternative System e-ET e-ET (The system identifiers are from the header, though I reversed the order, since I always look at the header first.) The two systems were nearly equal in terms of the average value of ET estimates. However, the reference system estimated much more ET. As a result, the alternative system has a higher net efficiency; it removes significantly more water per unit of water removed. This was a smaller-than-normal ET event, so it is possible that the results would have been more significant if the reference system had been present in the alternative system, even with only a few days' data, but I didn't investigate that. In any case, it seems that, for our purposes, using the alternative system is probably the best option. -Dan Article in IEEE Spectrum from January
