"New AI and the use of live data have enabled us to re-engineer the whole game, making it easier to control players, make decisions and react in real time," said Peter Eriksson, gameplay lead. "The impact that technology and data has had on the development of football games is very positive - it's fair to say that the quality and scope of football games has never been as high as it is today."

HyperMotion Technology will mark the first time real-life players' movements have been used to power soccer games on any platform. This technology has been designed to give the game an entirely new feel by giving the player full control over the ball, so each movement in the field of play affects the game in real-time. In addition to its use in the game, the players will also wear VICON markers on their bodies. This will allow player data to be obtained continuously during training sessions and in-season, providing the most up-to-date training feedback for footballers. HyperMotion Technology brings fresh new gameplay and a completely new way of thinking when it comes to managing players. It will give more control to the player and the game will be centered around decisions and tactics. "FIFA 22 will feel much more intuitive and be easier to control than ever before," said Craig Kirkconnell, Managing Director of EA SPORTS. "New AI and the use of live data have enabled us to re-engineer the whole game, making it easier to control players, make decisions and react in real time," added Eriksson. "The impact that technology and data has had on the development of football games is very positive - it's fair to say that the quality and scope of football games has never been as high as it is today." So the FIFA team pushed back and worked with another one of them to assemble a figure who can explain the game better than he already has. They found, in Paul the Gladiator, a man who was willing to wear a skin tight jumpsuit, make a short film of him trying to explain the game and leave the results to you. The results were mixed at best. But they were good enough to give us a real reason to spend 45 minutes with Mr. Paul in the simulated Piazza Duomo. It's time for a reaction video of the game, follow us as we take you through it! The authors of [ @bib2 ] recently reported on their analysis of 210
