Language Tutor
FR+ENFormer President Obama was active on Twitter from his earliest days in office, tapping the social media network for a variety of different reasons. One of the most intriguing came on the day he announced he was running for President in 2008, when he tried to set the record straight about his views on the “bitter” Vermont senator who was being touted by many as his top choice. “Vermont Sen. [Bernie] Sanders is a decent guy who has impressed me personally with his sincerity,” Obama wrote in a post directed toward his followers. “The point is, though, that he’s also a decent guy who, over the last few years, has been caught up in the politics of the moment. He’s a senator who has been in Washington, even before he was a senator, for a long time and has represented his state well,” he added. “But there is a whole lot of difference between being a common characters removed? I'm working on a list of functions and wondering if there is an existing function that can do this. What I'm looking for is a command that looks at two strings (no more than a few characters in length) and removes characters that have multiple occurrences from the right string and joins together the remaining characters in the left string. For example:

> defjoin(["test", "a", "b",
"b", "a", "a"]) > ["t", "e", "s", "t", "t", "a", "a"]

Ideally, it would be a boolean/command based on the string inside of it.

A: There's no such built-in function. You can first use a list comprehension
