A role for glucose-induced protein kinase C activation in islet beta-cell regulation. Glucose regulates islet function in part through its effect on insulin biosynthesis. Although the precise signal transduction mechanisms of this glucose effect are not defined, glucose has been reported to stimulate protein kinase C (PKC). Because PKC is thought to influence cellular biosynthetic processes in part through phosphorylation of lipids and proteins, we examined the role of glucose-induced PKC in regulating islet beta-cell replication. Islets were cultured overnight in 17 or 5.6 mM glucose, then stimulated with 8.3 mM glucose for 30 min. PKC activity and translocation were measured and insulin secretion was assessed in cultured islets or beta TC6 cell line. Glucose stimulation increased PKC activity in islets and beta TC6 cells, and translocation from cytosol to membrane. Whereas PKC stimulation was not sufficient to induce insulin biosynthesis, co-stimulation with glucose did stimulate 3-O-methylglucose transport, reflecting increased glucose uptake into beta-cells. Thus, glucose-induced PKC activity is associated with increased glucose transport, and glucose co-stimulation selectively influences glucose transport but not biosynthetic processes. These results suggest that activation of PKC is an obligatory part of the islet cell response to glucose, and that glucose-induced PKC activity may influence the formation and translocation of signal transduction proteins.
