The control of mammalian cell growth requires the expression of multiple genes. These genes have distinct functions including cell growth and division, inhibition of apoptosis, and cell adhesion. The division of cells requires a complex interplay of signaling pathways that are triggered in response to specific extracellular cues. Aberrant cell growth is linked to many diseases including cancer and inflammatory diseases. Fibroblasts are the primary cells of the connective tissue that play a pivotal role in supporting and protecting the entire body. Fibroblasts have both contractile and synthetic functions and are involved in wound healing. Fibroblasts also protect epithelial cells from apoptotic stimuli. Myofibroblasts are the major cells that are responsible for fibroblast contraction and extracellular matrix secretion in wound healing and fibrosis. Myofibroblasts can be distinguished from fibroblasts and other non-myofibroblast cell types on the basis of their expression of smooth muscle alpha actin ( $\alpha$ -SMA). Myofibroblasts were first identified in scar tissue as cells that were characterized by their positive staining for  $\alpha$ -SMA.  $\alpha$ -SMA is one of the most reliable markers of myofibroblasts and is essential for the formation of stress fibers during contraction and secretion of a contractile collagen matrix.  $\alpha$ -SMA is expressed in normal tissues to form stress fibers. However, pathological myofibroblasts form stress fibers when normal myofibroblast-to-myofibroblast interactions are disrupted. There have been many reports that myofibroblasts are a major component of tissue fibrosis and that myofibroblasts are critical in the development of fibrotic lesions in a variety of organs. Fibrosis can develop at any time from birth until death with few exceptions. This widespread chronic inflammation and wound healing process can result in fibrotic lesions with scar formation, loss of function, and eventual organ failure. Once established, fibrosis and scar formation can progress very quickly to a point where normal functioning of the organ is impossible. The leading cause of morbidity and mortality worldwide is a group of related disorders with diverse etiologies, yet they share some common characteristics; they all produce a relentless progression of fibrosis and scar tissue formation. This group of diseases include cirrhosis of the liver, cancer of the liver and lungs (carcinoma), and the loss of lung or liver function due to idiopath

Q: Should I encrypt passwords in-memory? When I use PHP in an application, and store hashed user credentials, should I store a password like so: `$password = sha1($password);` Or, `$password = hash('sha1', $password);` How does the `$password = "0xf93983e0a313e317"` differ from `$password = "0xf93983e0a313e317"`? A: The above code produces the same result (in theory). `$password = sha1($password);` is a shorthand for: `$password = hash('sha1', $password);` Q: How to use multiple spring beans in one method on time? I have spring mvc application that uses two different spring beans. I need to access both of them in one method. How to do that?
