All Rights Reserved. half of the 1,500 new bitcoin ATMs that were installed on the world in 2018 are still working, as the industry is being squeezed to the point of bankruptcy. This week, Coin ATM Radar reported on an alarming trend that has emerged in the past year as the bitcoin ATM industry contracts. Only about 500 machines, or nearly 30% of the 1,500 ATMs installed in 2018, are still functional and used. The industry's troubles became apparent after Bitcoin Cash, the world's fifth-largest crypto asset by market cap, launched a new form of ATM just days after going through an exodus of more than a third of its altcoins. Attention of developers with the Bitcoin Core (BTC) community has largely shifted away from working on their own open-source projects, including full node privacy software and block size solutions. As a result, the ATM industry, which did not exist just a few years ago, has yet to receive adequate regulatory support. Top-ranked players in the field are shutting down their operations, leaving new entrants few options to launch an ATM business. A survey of 103 bitcoin ATM operators published in July, found that about 30% of them expect to run out of capital by the end of this year. ATMs for crypto-to-fiat exchanges are also being abandoned by the industry's existing players. Companies that haven't even laid out a business plan for their ATMs due to the lack of demand The number of new bitcoin ATMs installed last year can be considered a continuation of the trend that started in 2017. One report from Coin ATM Radar states that out of the 1,500 ATMs installed in 2018, just slightly more than half are still active. More than
