Monday, April 15, 2018â€”Reports from Sri Lankaâ€™s Industrialist Federation (FIL) cited. theÂ .Q: angular 2 refresh data with lazy loaded routes after x-minutes I am trying to refresh my view after 5 minutes of inactivity and currently my implementation is: Component: setTimeout(() => { this.dataSource = new MatTableDataSource(this.elements); }, 5 * 60000); In this component I am using MatTableDataSource which is basically calling api to fetch the data. I have used global dataSource property because I have to refresh the data according to the logged in user export class SubComponent { private dataSource; constructor(private elementService: ElementService) { } getData() { this.dataSource = new MatTableDataSource(this.elementService.getElements()); } Parent Component: @Component({ selector: 'app-global', templateUrl: './global.component.html', styleUrls: ['./global.component.scss'], providers: [ElementService] }) export class GlobalComponent implements OnInit { dataSource; onSubmit = (form: NgForm): void => { form.valueChanges.subscribe(value => { console.log(value); }); }; constructor(private elementService: ElementService, private router: Router) { } ngOnInit(): void { this.dataSource = new MatTableDataSource(elementService.getElements()); } } The above solution works but I have to write boilerplate code again in my subcomponents like getData() because I have to fetch the data. Is there any way to avoid this? So I want to avoid redundancy in my code. If I have elementService.getElements().subscribe, then I have to place the subscribe in every component like in constructor()? What is the alternative of this? A: Using localStorage is a solution to this problem. You can set value in localStorage in components so that they can fetch the data from the localStorage and work on
