I am having trouble to understand the difference between polymorphic associations and multiple tables. Say, if I have a buyer model. For each buyer, I have a product table and, obviously, a unique product_id. Now, I want to add a company to the buyer table, and a buyer can have more than one company. From a classical point of view, I am tempted to add a column in my buyer table that specifies the company for which this buyer is affiliated. In other words, I am tempted to use a polymorphic association. Am I wrong? What is the difference between both approaches? A: Polymorphic associations are when you want different things for a single attribute value. For instance, instead of having a unique Key field for each record, you can choose to have a set of Key (string) fields for the different types of records, and go with a polymorphic association. What happens in that case is that the concrete class responsible for creating the instances of buyer will decide which type of Key it wants, and it will have a factory method/class to create instances of that type. For example, public abstract class Buyer { protected abstract void doSomethingWithKeys(String key); } public class Developer extends Buyer { @Override protected void doSomethingWithKeys(String key) { // developer does something with the keys } } public class User extends Buyer { @Override protected void doSomethingWithKeys(String key) { // user does something with the keys } } Here, Buyer has two methods that can be overridden to do different things with the key, but
