Q: Is there such a thing as 'particular emphasis'? I recently came across this excerpt in my readings (from "A Course in Miracles"): No one ever tires of saying "Thank you," for if one told lies one would never be understood. If there were a particular emphasis of course, when one thinks "Thank you," that would be the sentence. For that is the most direct and penetrating, because it does not pretend to understand, but truly receives. (Pg. 8: The Second Step)
Is this 'particular emphasis' that the speaker talks about a real thing? If so, what does it refer to? I'm trying to figure this out by myself, but I don't even know if I'm looking for the right words to research it. Thanks in advance. EDIT: I think this article describes what I'm talking about: A: in the context of finding the answer to your question, it seems that what you're looking for is called a gerund. The gerund is the informal form of the verb that shows the action of a verb as being done at a specific time. In this case "When one thinks "Thank you," would be the gerund. A: There is a specific word for what you're looking for. It is called a gerund: Gerund [Geru'nd, 'arən ] n. A verb form that is used as a noun Specifically, if we take a look at this definition for the verb, we can see that the definition of a gerund is a verb form that is used as a noun. So, "when one thinks "Thank you," is not a gerund. It's a verb form which is used as a noun, but it's not a gerund. The author is not recommending to change the sentence to "When one thinks *Thank you", but "When one thinks 'Thank you'". This is because when one thinks "thank you", the gerund form of the verb "think" is "thinking". The writer is trying to point out that the word "thinking" is awkward if we try to use it in a sentence like "When one thinks '

Ceramic Matrix Composite (CMC) Matrix Composites are largely used for the formation of structural components because of their lightweight, low density and resistance against damage and corrosion. The Matrix Composites are fabricated by a series of steps, including a powder slip casting process, a matching process, and a consolidation process. A thermocompression consolidation process, which is usually conducted at a high temperature and a high pressure, is used for the consolidation of the solidified powder. According to the theory of the powder slip casting process, if the particles of the powder undergo deformation as they are subjected to pressure forces and friction caused during the process, and the particles of the powder are allowed to flow with a vacuum, the solidified powder layers are joined to each other to form a uniform matrix structure. During this process, as the powder particles are compressed and bound together, they are also heated to a temperature higher than the temperature that induces crystallization of the grains of the powder. This heating is continued until the powder particles are consolidated into matrixes, and are thus densified to form the solidified matrix. As a result, a ceramic product of a ceramic layer of a desired thickness is obtained. According to this process, the consolidation of the powder layer occurs by the following three steps: 1. The stacking of the powder particles at the interface between them is increased by high pressure and friction between the powder particles, so that the binding among the powder particles is established; PA1 2. The grains of the powder are compressed, heated, and solidified; PA1 3. The densification of the powder is completed by an applied pressure. By using the pressure as described above, the ceramic powder is consolidated to form a laminated structure having a desired thickness. To this end, the step of applying the pressure, which is considered to be one of the most important processes in the entire process, is one of the key issues to be considered. The pressure application can be carried out mechanically, chemically, and electrically. In the mechanical pressure application, a pressure is applied to a powder by using the inner pressure of a container that includes a die or a plunger to compress the powder. In the chemical pressure application, a chemical agent is mixed with a powder to obtain a resin system, and then, an epoxy resin and a suitable solvent are added to the system to form a composite. Thereafter, the composite is heated so that the organic resin is decomposed, and the obtained composite is then solidified to thereby
