May needs the vote of the queen or parliament's approval to start Britain's scheduled departure on March 29, but a growing number of lawmakers want to prevent the vote from going ahead because they do not want to leave the bloc without a deal. Lawmakers voted on Monday to reject May's bid to have parliament's approval to trigger article 50, the formal mechanism to begin the exit process, because they do not want to leave without a deal on March 29, the day Britain's three-year EU membership expires. Brexit has paralyzed British politics and May has been unable to get parliament's approval for a deal that she has described as the best available to leave the EU. She has said a request to the EU to delay Brexit beyond the scheduled departure date would be unacceptable because it would make the United Kingdom an EU "vassal state". Parliament wants Britain to seek an extension to the March 29 deadline if a deal is not in place before the date, but May has rejected any further delay. Lawmakers were unlikely to approve any deal that May has on offer because they want to prevent Britain leaving the EU without a deal and some parliamentarians want a second referendum on Brexit. So a technical requirement that May ask for an extension to article 50 was one of the few options left to stop Brexit altogether. The Supreme Court, which is the UK's highest court, ruled that
