Ipsos found that more than 1 in 4 Americans say they have stopped buying music because it's illegal, and 1 in 5 finds this statement encouraging: While I would argue that most people who hear this statement, will immediately get it out of their heads if they didn't already believe it, an interesting fact is that they don't realize that it's also wrong. It's a form of self-justification that actually harms the consumer by perpetuating the illegal status of music. Just this week, the US Supreme Court affirmed that the Constitution guarantees the right to own and use drugs. The Court's ruling will likely open the door for other states to follow suit and legalize recreational marijuana. I couldn't help but feel sorry for the record labels. For decades, they've had to defend themselves against arguments like the one I just mentioned. They've even had to compete with criminals who have pretended to sell them cannabis. If you are wondering why the U.S. Supreme Court declined to review the decision, it would be helpful to know how the Copyright Act of 1790 defined "copy" as the basis for a violation of copyright law. According to the law, "any person," including the owner of the copyright, could make copies without infringing on copyright law. A student sued her professor for copyright infringement after being assigned a homework assignment that the professor placed on her blog, without her consent. The court ruled that the student was a businessperson, which puts her outside the protection of the copyright laws. If you're looking for a quick and convenient way to test the functionality of your Wireless N router, you may want to download and install the Cisco Wireless N Client (WWNC). The WWNC is a graphical interface for viewing your router's basic information. What began as an April Fool's joke has become an important tool for service providers in their quest to up their customer service game, whether that's for good or for bad. By default, the iPhone's Home button sends an SMS alert. However, if you're the kind of person who routinely ignores SMS alerts, this feature may not be helpful, and could actually get in the way of your day. Want to

I am a developer who is interested in transitioning to being a PM. However, I still have a great deal of technical skills (including being able to do project management). How should I approach the question of whether I should try to find remote work that doesn't directly rely on my development skills? On the one hand, I would like to take advantage of these skills if it is advantageous. On the other hand, there are some that could see my technical skill set as a negative and not want to hire me. Any advice here would be appreciated! A: It's a pretty tough question. On the one hand: You're interested in moving into project management, and you're already good at managing software projects. On the other hand: ... a developer who is interested in transitioning to being a PM would never take jobs that didn't need them ... a PM who works at a company that was a start-up once might be able to suggest that they don't need a PM ... it can be a massive pain in the ass when the d0c515b9f4

Approximately 50% of patients with type 2 diabetes mellitus will develop retinopathy, a progressive retinal disorder that can lead to vision loss. However, the pathogenesis of retinopathy remains poorly understood. This proposal seeks support to establish a new research program that seeks to determine the impact of hyperglycemia on retinal blood flow in experimental animals. We hypothesize that hyperglycemia, itself, or hyperglycemia that results from metabolic changes associated with uncontrolled type 2 diabetes mellitus, affects retinal blood flow and vascular responses that are secondary to elevations in systemic blood pressure. We propose that the diabetic retinopathy observed in patients with type 2 diabetes mellitus is mediated by vascular dysfunction caused by reactive oxygen species (ROS) production. In this regard, it is likely that there is an overproduction of ROS in response to hyperglycemia, resulting in DNA damage and vascular dysfunction. We will employ a number of novel in vivo techniques, such as laser Doppler velocimetry, fluorescein angiography, laser speckle contrast imaging, flicker photometry, optical coherence tomography (OCT), and vascular reactivity testing to determine the effects of hyperglycemia on retinal blood flow and vascular response to elevations in systemic blood pressure. The functional and morphological alterations of the retina will be determined at clinically relevant hyperglycemia in a rat model of type 2 diabetes mellitus induced by high fat diet in combination with a low dose of streptozotocin (45 mg/kg body weight), as well as in rats that have been made diabetic by the injection of a high dose of streptozotocin (100 mg/kg body weight) without inducing weight loss. We will also employ a rodent model of type 1 diabetes mellitus to evaluate whether there is increased susceptibility to retinopathy in type 1 diabetes mellitus. Our proposal will also determine the magnitude of oxidative stress using a novel colorimetric method that has been developed in our laboratory, as well as the degree of inflammation by measuring expression of selected cytokines that play a role in the pathogenesis of diabetic retinopathy in the retina. Finally
