Somatic action potential recording in pre-implantation blastocysts in mice. Blastocysts of the mouse and hamster were examined using glass microelectrode recordings of somatic action potentials. Resting potential, action potential and hyperpolarizing response to potassium ion-induced action potentials were recorded. Action potentials were sensitive to both magnesium (Mg^{2+}) and tetrodotoxin (TTX). A high- Mg^{2+} solution induced an elevation of membrane conductance, resulting in a damped membrane potential oscillation in isolated blastomeres. In activated blastomeres, two types of burst potential were detected; a compound type and a single type. The compound type potentials showed a delayed action potential appearance followed by an initial hyperpolarizing response. The single potential type showed only the hyperpolarizing response. Magnesium ion applied to the bath reduced the amplitude of the hyperpolarizing response. L-Glutamate (Glu) induced an increased membrane conductance, resulting in a decreased membrane potential
