Giles and Jonathan Green are the proprietors. Giles Greenslade, the proprietor, is in the centre of the top half of the photograph. His voice is audible, uttering sentences in a tone of great defensiveness. The other half of the photograph shows Jonathan, a younger man who is smartly dressed in a suit and overcoat. This man has a voice which is reserved and it is difficult to decide whether the sense of defensiveness has been conveyed by him or by Giles. In any event, the proprietors are sensitive to the fact that many people think of Little Green as a hang-out for left-wing eccentrics and, by extension, as a place associated with revolution. On the wall facing the Green brothers can be seen a large cross. Giles is standing in the middle of the centre of the cross. Giles is pictured holding a newspaper over his face. His thumbs are pressed on the newspaper up against his eyes. The newspaper has the headline 'Up to 900 Expel Cadres from Hong Kong'. The background of the picture is a view of the Little Green from a point north of the cross. The light is very bright, of the same kind as that in the first picture of Little Green, but the sun is lower in the sky and therefore it is cooler. The picture is taken
