These connectors can be mounted to the printed circuit board using various contact structures. One type of contact structure is a socket that receives and electrically connects a complementary plug connector. FIG. 1 shows a socket 10 as used in the prior art. The socket 10 comprises a body 14 with a forward end 12 and a rearward end 13. The body 14 of the socket is formed with a plurality of electrically insulating posts 16 along the rearward end 13 of the socket. These posts 16 project into a corresponding plurality of apertures 18 formed in a printed circuit board 19. A male connector 20 is adapted to mate with the socket 10. In operation, the male connector 20 is disposed in the socket 10 so that the posts 16 engage with the apertures 18 of the printed circuit board 19. The male connector 20 is then rotated into engagement with the apertures 18. When the male connector 20 is disposed in the socket 10 the male connector is electrically coupled to the printed circuit board 19. One problem with the socket 10 of FIG. 1 is that the socket is not capable of accepting a variety of different types of male connector devices. In particular, the male connector 20 used with this socket 10 is restricted to use with a specific female connector. If a different female connector is required, a different socket must be supplied. Another problem with the socket 10 is that removal of the male connector requires rotation of the male connector relative to the socket. The male connector must be rotationally maneuvered to remove the male connector from the socket. This is difficult and time consuming. Another problem with the socket 10 of FIG. 1 is that the socket
