charging astronomical sums to use your phone on the go, so installing a satellite is not only the last recourse for those who refuse to pay for Verizon or Sprint's services, but also a last resort for anyone who wants to get wireless data that doesn't support throttling. Yes, it is somewhat ironic that the second generation of cell phones are the most expensive way to get voice and data across the country (and the world) as they've increased bandwidth and data caps. But for those who like their phones, data caps, and the freedom of not having to give a middle finger to your carrier for a phone's free trial period, here is a way to get the way you want. FCC auction: Iridium fails to raise second round of funding The first-generation Iridium satellite constellation has failed to raise enough money to cover its operating expenses. In 2006, Iridium raised $630 million in a series of equity and debt
